A lot has been announced recently about the brand new version of FIFA. Most notable is the introduction of "HyperMotion," which is what EA calls the new, "FIFA 12"-inspired features for the new edition of the long-running soccer videogame. HyperMotion actually refers to the brand new motion-capture technology by which EA is able to accurately capture and render the movements of the players. And what I thought would be the first was the full demo of EA's new "FIFA 22" would be given in E3, was not the case. Rather, the demo was given in Microsoft's E3 presentation. I'm sure EA will be giving a full demo of FIFA 22 at E3, but I wanted to take a few minutes and explain more about EA's newest football videogame. I was able to have a lengthy conversation with a few of the designers on FIFA 22, and also had a chance to play the game on EA's E3 stage, where we got a chance to play a couple of scenarios, including the first live-action demo of the brand new player dribbling, "FIFA 22" protagonist players, attacking, defending, shooting and goalkeeping. I'm excited to share some of the details, but I want to start off by saying, this is just the tip of the iceberg with FIFA 22, the game is looking very cool. First, a recap of what is new in FIFA 22: 1. FIFA Connected and Virtual Pro players: EA says that a huge number of players around the world have asked for both online and offline FIFA 22 games. EA will use the data generated by the motion capture suits that players wear during the real-life matches to make FIFA Connected players and Virtual Pro soccer players. Even though there are over 100,000 different faces in the game, if you are playing in the Ultimate Team mode in FIFA Connected, you will play as your real-life squad, even if you aren't in an actual squad. However, if you want to play as a player in the Human World of FIFA Ultimate Team mode, you will start out as your real-life player and then you will unlock other players as you play in Career mode. However, if you are playing FIFA 22 online in the new In-Play challenges, you won't have to wait until you play the game to unlock
